

Communication - B.A.

The Communication bachelor's degree provides students with the opportunity to build upon foundational communication principles and leverage new knowledge into practical skills and marketable proficiencies. Graduates of this program can seek opportunities in a number of various and challenging positions.

Upon completion of the program, graduates are expected to:

- Discuss the research literature of the subfields of communication, such as organizational, interpersonal, intercultural, rhetorical or media.
- Analyze the processes of how humans communicate to solve problems where ethical judgments, professional values and culturally-sensitive competencies are required.
- Develop purposeful messages in a variety of mediums for a range of audiences.
- Apply communication theories and methods to the creation of original work.

Upon completion of the Professional Communication specialization, graduates are expected to:

- Demonstrate excellence in the processes of professional writing, such as drafting, revising, editing and publishing.
